

For one thing, he said, two years ago. He said a rise from 7 cents to an ounce for handling air mail and an increase from 3 to 4 cents for postcards generally and a rise from 3 to 6 cents for carrying postcards air mail. Increases, too, would be made in the handling of publishers' mail, second class, with an average of 42 per cent up in a one-half-cent rise in carrying such piece mail. In addition, advertising mail would be increased 42 per cent.

Extra Charges Provided

The Postmaster General also would be given orders to employ administrative action to put extra charges on "official" or "penalty" mail. This is mail moving off Capitol Hill and from the departments and agencies.

The Republican leaders who attended the weekly White House meeting returned to the Capitol in a non-committal mood. It appeared that formal legislation, soon to be dropped on the Congress, would receive a minimum of support in the election year. The proposed 5-cent stamp for letters, it was brought out, would impose a heavy additional burden upon a large segment of the voting public, especially on business, and in no small part on households where the mailing might not be large but where mailing pennies were counted, too.

Likely to 'Run Into Trouble'

There was no immediate affirmative response in either the Senate or the House. Within the committee that will make the recommendations there were reminders that a program as strong as the President outlined today would undoubtedly "run into trouble" when the formal request for action arrived.

The proposed 5-cent letter stamp has lost out before it has other repeated recommendations. Neither Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen, the Senate minority leader from Illinois, nor House counterpart Representative Charles A. Halleck, of Indiana, would predict the outcome. Senator Olin D. Johnston, the South Carolina Democrat who heads the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and Clarence Cannon of Missouri, Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, predicted that the rate increase would not be allowed.
